Abstract
This paper discusses the judicial and statutory constructs of the Chambers v. Omaha Girls Club Role Model Rule,³ which protects the rights of employers to take adverse employment actions against unsuitable role models in certain circumstances, in relation to transgender teachers. It includes an introduction to Gender Identity, a brief discussion of how Title VII’s prohibition on sex discrimination should be interpreted to prohibit discrimination on the basis of gender identity, and a survey of parental and societal responses to the recent coming out of transgender teachers across America. It argues that adverse action taken against transgender teachers on the basis that they are poor role models for youth violates Title VII, as well as various state and local anti-discrimination laws.

Introduction

In 1975, teacher aides Lestine Rogers and Katie Mae Andrews were told that they could not work in Mississippi’s Drew Municipal School District based on a specific trait. The superintendent said that he was “disturbed” by their trait, stating that it was an “irredeemable moral disease.” Thirty years later, teachers Leslie Webster and Lily McBeth faced the same type of criticism—only it came from the parents of their students, and not the school board. Both teachers were criticized for making their trait known, and Mr. Webster was even accused of robbing his students of their childhoods, and of “stabbing” the children’s psyches.

The moral character of teachers is a serious concern among parents and society in general. Teachers are in the unique position of spending several hours a day with children, “exerting a subtle but important influence over their perceptions and values.” It is thus understandable that parents and school boards alike would be loath to employ people with questionable morals. In 1975, the “moral disease” that Ms. Rogers and Ms. Andrews were accused of was that they were single mothers. In 2005, the “immoral” characteristic of Leslie Webster and Lily McBeth was that they were, and are, both transgender.

In recent years, stories of transgender teachers have become more frequent and more publicized. Consequently, these stories have spurred heated debates about the competency.

mental stability,11 trustworthiness,12 and morality13 of transgender teachers. This debate is depicted, to an extent,14 in the postings and commentaries in the blogosphere,15 and demonstrates the conflicting ways that transgender teachers can be understood as role models; depending on one’s perspective, they can be either a positive or negative role model.

For example, when Ms. McBeth reapplyed to her former school district after transitioning,16 she faced opposition from several parents.17 However, there were also other parents, and many students,18 who supported her return to their district.19 In the case of Mr. Webster, when he informed his school that he would be returning to the school year as a man, the Headmaster voiced his support of Mr. Webster’s transition. He drafted an open letter to the parents of children at the school,20 and encouraged them to speak with their children openly and honestly about the change. Again, there were parents who opposed both Mr. Webster’s transition and the school’s embrace of him, but for the most part, the parents and students were accepting of Mr. Webster. These situations show that, while some parents were opposed to the employment of these teachers, the schools recognized the positive impact that these two teachers could have in the lives of the students.

Instead of the parents removing their children from the classrooms, this is a perfect opportunity for the parents to teach the children about DIVERSITY. The world is full of people and beliefs that not all of us agree on. You can't just teach your kids if they don't like it to leave. You need to teach them that they do not have to agree with another person's belief, but they must respect the other person's belief. That is what makes living in this country so wonderful.

Such teachers could serve as role models for understanding diversity and acceptance.

However, the variety of reactions to teachers who have transitioned, and the growing comfort of transgender individuals to “come out,” indicates that this issue is one that is likely to grow over time. Unfortunately, transgender individuals are vulnerable to discrimination due to a lack of statutory and judicial protections.

As is true of discrimination against other minority groups, prejudice towards transgender people is based on pervasive misunderstandings and false generalizations of what and who transgender people are. However, unlike other minority groups, such as race and religion,\textsuperscript{28} discrimination on the basis of gender identity is not explicitly prohibited by federal law, and only a handful of states include gender identity in their anti-discrimination laws.\textsuperscript{29} Without explicit laws, transgender employees are exposed to, and defenseless against, adverse actions on the basis that schools do not find transgender people suitable to teach children.

Another hurdle that transgender teachers face is the judicially created Role Model Rule,\textsuperscript{30} an exception from explicitly protected characteristics. It allows employers to take adverse actions against employees whom the employer deems a negative role model.\textsuperscript{31} Furthermore, the Rule has the potential to greatly impact transgender teachers because it has relevance both in states that have explicit gender identity provisions, as well as those that do not.\textsuperscript{32}

Similarly, state statutes have statutory provisions that include “immorality” as a reason to revoke a teacher’s certification.\textsuperscript{33} Immorality, though, is a nebulous term, partly due to the evolution of the standard of morality over time;\textsuperscript{34} what was considered immoral thirty-five years ago is now considered commonplace.\textsuperscript{35} This paper will look at both the judicial and statutory conceptions of the Role Model Rule, in conjunction with parental and community opinions obtained from a survey of various news websites and blogs, to determine whether either of these theories protect transgender teachers, or whether they instead provide an excuse for discriminating school boards.

Part I of this paper provides a quick explanation of what it means to be transgender, as well as addresses misconceptions associated with transgender people. Part II begins with a brief

Part II will also discuss the inclusion of Gender Identity within the meaning of Title VII’s prohibition on sex discrimination. Part III will introduce both the judicial and the statutory constructs of the Role Model Rule. The section will then present a survey of parental and community attitudes regarding transgender teachers. Part III will then critically analyze the applicability of the Role Model Rule in light of societal views. This paper will conclude in Part IV.

Part I: Introduction to Gender Identity

A. Definitions and General Introduction to Gender Identity

As is evident from a survey of any bookstore, human beings place great importance on the self, and the need to improve one’s self, both internal and external, to achieve happiness. The import that people put on their outward appearance is evident by the fact that reality TV shows based on losing weight and getting makeovers to become more attractive, and thus happier, have become popular sources of entertainment. These attempts at changing one’s physical appearance to achieve happiness is accepted and welcomed into our homes on a weekly basis. However, those people who feel that their outer appearance does not match their personal sense of self, based not on weight or attraction but rather physical manifestations of gender, have a much harder time being accepted by society.

Gender identity is “[o]ne’s internal, personal sense of being a man or a woman.” While for the great majority of people it appears that their gender identity and their biological sense are in accord, there is a population\(^{40}\) whose gender identity does not match their biological sex—these people are transgender. The term “transgender”\(^{41}\) is an umbrella term that includes transsexuals, cross-dressers, drag kings and queens, and other gender-variant people.\(^{42}\) However, it should be noted that “transgender” is not synonymous with sexual orientation.\(^{43}\)

It is also important to clarify the difference between sex and gender for purposes of the following discussion. “Sex” is used to refer to the biological and chemical classifications of “male” and “female.”\(^{44}\) Sex is assigned at birth, and is based on chromosomes, hormones, internal reproductive organs, and genitals.\(^{45}\) “Gender” is used to refer to the behavioral traits traditionally associated with one sex or the other and in fact is often used as a synonym for sex.\(^{46}\)

The process of altering one’s birth sex to comply with one’s gender identity is called transitioning.\(^{47}\) Transitioning includes\(^{48}\) cultural, legal, and medical changes such as, but not limited to, coming out to friends and family, engaging in gender expression (e.g., altering clothing, haircut, and mannerisms), legally changing one’s name, taking hormones, and/or surgical alteration including Sex Reassignment Surgery (SRS).49

The American Psychological Association (“APA”) first included the term “transsexual” in its Diagnostic and Statistical Manual of Mental Disorders (“DSM”) in its third edition, and again in DSM-III-R.50 In DSM-IV, the APA replaced “Transsexualism” with “Gender Identity Disorder” (“GID”).51 GID remains in the current version, DSM-IV-TR,52 and provides diagnostic criteria.53

In the middle of the twentieth century, Dr. Harry Benjamin and Alfred Kinsey worked with transgender individuals.54 Dr. Benjamin eventually began the Harry Benjamin International Gender Dysphoria Association, Inc.55 where he developed the Harry Benjamin Standards of Care for transgender individuals transitioning from their birth gender to the gender they actually identify with. The Standards of Care are a three-part approach to transitioning: 1) real-life experience, which is “[t]he act of fully adopting a new or evolving gender role or gender presentation in everyday life;” 2) hormone treatment; and 3) surgery, including mastectomy or breast implants, genital surgery, and other surgeries. Often, this triadic therapy begins with psychotherapy, although it is not a requirement.

However, not all transgender people follow these Standards of Care. Sometimes people choose to begin presenting as their gender identity with their friends or family before they begin presenting full-time. Furthermore, many transgender people cannot afford SRS, and so, for example, female-to-male (“FTM”) transgender men may bind their breasts, and male-to-female (“MTF”) transgender women may use waist cinchers or corsets to alter their body.

While GID is generally accepted in the medical community, there are many opponents, as well. The GID Reform Advocates are proponents of the “reform of the psychiatric classification of gender diversity as mental disorder,” because by its very terminology labels people as “disordered.” The classification of transgender people as being mentally deficient “reinforce[s] false, negative stereotypes of gender variant people … The result is that a widening segment of gender non-conforming youth and adults are potentially subject to diagnosis of psychosexual disorder, stigma and loss of civil liberty.”

B. Misperceptions of Transgender People

It is common for people to underestimate the emotional suffering that transgender people endure prior to transitioning. People also discount the realness of this suffering: the feelings of displacement and the experience of being shunned from society. In extreme cases, people may equate being transgender with mental instability or sexual deviancy. These misperceptions about transgender people are often based upon uncertainty and fear, and they ultimately lead to discriminatory conduct and attitudes.

Beyond personal opinions, misconceptions of transgender people are evident in colloquial terminology used in reference to transgender people. For example, it is common for... people to use a term such as “he/she” when they are unclear as to which term to use. However, while this may not be intended to be harmful, this term is viewed as a slur by many transgender people.79 Another prevalent misperception about transgender people is that they are pretending to be something they are not.80 But suggesting that one’s gender identity is a farce can prove damaging;81 “[g]ender identity is an integral part of a person’s identity.”82

C. Statutory Protections for Gender Identity

Another common misunderstanding of gender identity is that it is a class that is protected by anti-discrimination laws,83 when, in fact, there are only twelve states and the District of Columbia that have enacted such laws.84 However, statutory protections for transgender people have rapidly grown over the past few years. For example, in 2003, only four states had prohibitions against discrimination on the basis of gender identity.85 But in the past five years, eight states and the District of Columbia have enacted their own gender identity anti-discrimination laws.86 In addition, another 108 cities and counties nationwide have their own local laws.87 This trend suggests the possibility of the likelihood of the passage of a federal anti-discrimination law that prohibits discrimination on the basis of gender identity.

The Employment Non-Discrimination Act, H.R. 2015, (“ENDA”) is a proposed federal law that would prohibit discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation and gender identity in the workplace. “It would reinforce the principle that employment decisions should be based upon a person’s qualifications and job performance.”88 Currently, there are two versions of ENDA:89 H.R. 2015 that includes protection both on the basis of gender identity and sexual orientation, and H.R. 3685 that only prohibits discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation.90 On November 7, 2007, the House of Representatives passed H.R. 3685. Although further action has yet to be taken, this shows the great strides that those in the fight for equality are making.91

Other evidence of a trend towards transgender-inclusion can be found in the number of non-discrimination policies in Fortune 500 companies. “[A]s of November 2007, over thirty percent of Fortune 500 companies include transgender people in their policies. This is more then 10 times the number that had such policies in 2001…”92

Furthermore, the passage of H.R. 2015 is now more likely with the incoming Congress and President than it has been in the past.

employee to quit his or her job at any time and for any reason. Similarly, an employer is free to terminate an employee for any time and for any reason without warning and without “incurring any post-employment obligations.”

However, public school teachers often belong to a union which may provide the added protection of “just cause” termination. The Standard of Cause says that an employee’s termination must be reasonable and neither arbitrary, excessive, nor discriminatory.

Regardless of whether teachers are at-will employees or unionized, state statutes and federal laws, such as Title VII, provide further regulations for the hiring, firing, certification, and decertification of teachers.

B. Title VII

Title VII of the Civil Rights Act was enacted in 1964, and it prohibits employers from discriminating against employees on the basis of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. The primary purpose of Title VII was to eliminate race-based discrimination in employment, but at the last minute, the category of “sex” was added to the Civil Rights Bill. Due to this last minute addition, the enactors of this legislation did not clearly delineate the exact parameters of “sex,” and there is a “total lack of legislative history” regarding sex. Today, it is widely accepted that “sex” includes biological sex as well as gender, but does not include sexual orientation.\textsuperscript{101}

1. Expansion of Title VII Protection to Transgender People

Gender Identity is not specifically included in Title VII’s protected classes.\textsuperscript{102} However, courts have begun to interpret “sex” more broadly, with several holding that it could reach discrimination on the basis of gender identity.\textsuperscript{103} Two arguments have been made to support a broader reading of “sex”: the first is discrimination based on sex stereotyping, and the second is that discrimination based on gender identity is literally discrimination on the basis of sex.

a. Sex Stereotyping\textsuperscript{104}

In \textit{Price Waterhouse v. Hopkins},\textsuperscript{105} Ann Hopkins asserted that she had been denied partnership because she did not conform to the partners’ preconceived notions of how a woman should look and behave.\textsuperscript{106} The Supreme Court said that these stereotypes of how a woman should present herself were evidence of discrimination on the basis of gender non-conformity.\textsuperscript{107} This direct evidence of gender stereotyping, said the Court, can support a claim of discrimination

\textsuperscript{101} However, while Title VII does not provide protection for discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation, in 1998, President Clinton issued Executive Order 13087 that explicitly prohibits discrimination on the basis of sexual orientation in federal civil service. Azteca Restaurant Enterprises, Inc.}, 256 F.3d 864 (9th Cir. 2001) (holding that the claimant, a straight male who was perceived as being too feminine, was the target of impermissible sex stereotyping).

\textsuperscript{107} “In the context of sex stereotyping, an employer who acts on the basis of a belief that a woman cannot be aggressive, or that she must not be, has acted on the basis of gender.” \textit{Price Waterhouse}, supra note 110, at 250.
because of sex, and courts began to rely on the interchangeability of the terms “sex” and “gender.”

The court in Smith v. City of Salem, Ohio, used the reasoning in Price Waterhouse to hold that impermissible sex-stereotyping extends to transgender people who are discriminated against because of their gender non-conforming conduct. The Sixth Circuit stated, > After Price Waterhouse, an employer who discriminates against women because, for instance, they do not wear dresses or makeup, is engaging in sex discrimination because the discrimination would not occur but for the victim’s sex. It follows that employers who discriminate against men because they do wear dresses and makeup, or otherwise act femininely, are also engaging in sex discrimination, because the discrimination would not occur but for the victim’s sex.

Further, said the court, sex stereotyping is not conditional on the biological make-up of a person. Discrimination against a transgender person for failing to conform to his birth-gender norms is no different than discriminating against a woman for not acting like a woman.

In light of the Sixth Circuit’s conclusion that gender stereotyping discrimination against a transgender person can violate Title VII, and in conjunction with other Circuits that have relied on this reading of Price Waterhouse in their interpretation of other federal statutes, it appears that transgender claimants may continue to prevail on some claims. However, in order to prevail, a claimant must provide direct evidence that his or her specific behavior, appearance, 113 The Tenth Circuit also addressed the application of Price Waterhouse sex-stereotyping to transgender people. In Etsitty v. Utah Transit Auth., 502 F.3d 1215 (10th Cir. 2007), the court acknowledged that a transgender employee may be able to bring a discrimination claim based on sex stereotyping. However, the court stated that because Etsitty failed to present a genuine issue of fact, they “need not decide whether such a claim may extend Title VII protection to transsexuals who act and appear as a member of the opposite sex.” Id. at 1224.

and/or mannerisms do not conform to the employers’ stereotypes of how a person of that birth-gender should look and behave. Furthermore, the claimant must provide direct evidence that these stereotypes were the “driving force”\textsuperscript{115} behind the adverse action. As an example, for a MTF\textsuperscript{116} person to prevail, she would have to argue that she was discriminated against for being too feminine; it would not be sufficient for her to argue that she was discriminated against for being too masculine.\textsuperscript{117}

b. Gender Identity as “Sex”\textsuperscript{118}

Historically, courts declined to interpret Title VII’s prohibition of discrimination on the basis of sex as reaching gender identity discrimination,\textsuperscript{119} instead giving “sex” its “traditional definition based on anatomical characteristics.”\textsuperscript{120} The two leading cases supporting this contention are \textit{Ulane v. Eastern Airlines}\textsuperscript{121} and \textit{Holloway v. Arthur Andersen & Co.}\textsuperscript{122} These courts examined the language of the statute and balanced that with Congressional intent and legislative inactivity in enacting amendments to Title VII.\textsuperscript{123} They concluded that, particularly given the absence of legislative history, they must give the term its plain, traditional meaning, which, according to the courts, limits the interpretation of “sex” to only include “biological sex.”\textsuperscript{124} Furthermore, the courts noted Congress’ failure to enact amendments that would extend the definition of “sex” to include gender identity, stating that this Congressional inactivity provides further proof of Congress’ intent to limit Title VII protection to biological sex.

Several years later, in Oncale v. Sundowner Offshore Serv., the Supreme Court concluded that same-sex sexual harassment is actionable under Title VII’s prohibition on sex discrimination. In its reasoning, the Court acknowledged that while same-sex harassment was likely not what Congress intended when it enacted Title VII, it is important to recognize that “statutory prohibitions often go beyond the principal evil to cover reasonably comparable evils.” Thus, in both Price Waterhouse and Oncale, the Court showed a willingness to interpret “sex” quite broadly, effectively eviscerating the conclusions in Ulane and Holloway that limited “sex” to its traditional meaning.

Recently, in Schroer v. Billington, the D.C. District court held that Diane Schroer, a transgender woman, had been the victim of impermissible discrimination on the basis of sex. In its decision, the court relied on the Library of Congress’ own admission that it declined to hire Schroer only after she informed them “that she planned to change her anatomical sex by undergoing sex reassignment surgery.” The Library hired David Schroer, a male, and when it was faced with hiring a female, the Library retracted its offer. Had Diane Schroer been male she 128 490 U.S. at 250 (concluding that stereotypes based on sex are discrimination. This conclusion came from the Court broadening the interpretation of “sex” in Title VII to include not just biological sex, but also gender.

129 Ulane and Holloway both denied the plaintiffs’ claims because “they were considered victims of ‘gender’ rather than ‘sex’ discrimination.” Smith, 378 F.3d at 573. However, Price Waterhouse’s interpretation that “sex” includes gender rendered these arguments moot. See also, Smith, supra note 103, at 573; Schroer, supra note 103, at *12.

131 “Ultimately, I do not think that it matters for purposes of Title VII liability whether the Library withdrew its offer of employment because it perceived Schroer to be an insufficiently masculine man, an insufficiently feminine woman, or an inherently gender-nonconforming transsexual.” The court also analogized discrimination based on gender identity to discrimination based on religious conversion. “Imagine that an employee is fired because she converts from Christianity to Judaism. Imagine too that her employer testifies that he harbors no bias toward either Christians or Jews but only ‘converts.’ That would be a clear case of discrimination ‘because of religion.’ No court would take seriously the notion that ‘converts’ are not covered by the statute.” Schroer, supra note 103, at *11, *12.

would have been hired. But for her sex, her new sex, she was a good candidate, and, the court concluded, she was therefore, literally, discriminated against on the basis of sex.

Part III: Transgender Teachers As Role Models

Even if discrimination on the basis of gender identity is recognized by the courts and legislators, transgender teachers are faced with another barrier to being absolutely protected from discrimination and adverse actions. There are both statutory and judicially created exceptions to Title VII’s protections: the bona fide occupational qualification and the Role Model Rule.

A. Bona Fide Occupational Requirement

Title VII provides a statutory exception to its prohibition for making employment decisions on the basis of a protected class. The Bona Fide Occupational Qualification (“BFOQ”) exception states that it is lawful for an employer to refuse to hire a person because of their sex, if sex “is a bona fide occupational qualification reasonably necessary to the normal operation of that particular business.”

The BFOQ exception is to be interpreted extremely narrowly, and, as such, there are a number of circumstances where the BFOQ does not apply. For example, an employer cannot hire 133 Schroer, supra note 103, at *13. Sex stereotyping is not a claim that is available to plaintiffs on the basis of sexual orientation. Courts may therefore require more extensive evidence, as a precaution in recognizing a transgender person’s claim for sex stereotyping for fear that the claim will “be used to bootstrap protection for sexual orientation into Title VII.” Vickers v. Fairfield Med. Ctr., 453 F.3d 757, 764 (6th Cir. 2006).

135 The BFOQ only applies to religion, sex, or national origin. It does not apply to employment decisions on the basis of race or color. § 2000e-2(e)(1).

on the basis of gender stereotypes or client preference. Furthermore, sex is generally not a BFOQ for teaching positions. For instance, courts have held that sex is not a BFOQ for an assistant principal position, a full-time Physical Education teacher, or a school bus driver.

B. The Role Model Rule

“[A] teacher serves as a role model for his students, exerting a subtle but important influence over their perceptions and values.” Parents and society alike have long worried about this important influence. For example, in 1939, a woman was found to work as a waitress in a bar while being concurrently employed as a teacher. The school board discharged her, stating, “Educators have always regarded the example set by the teacher as of great importance, particularly in the education of the children in the lower grades,"146 and the example she set by not only working in a bar, but also consuming beer and playing dice was not an appropriate example for school-aged children.

The concern of the influence that teachers exert over their pupils, has led to extensive debate as to what makes a good role model. There has been some consensus that a teacher should teach tolerance and acceptance, among other social responsibilities, to young children.147 And there is a collective belief that the tolerance and acceptance that educators teach should conform to society’s attitudes and community norms. Beyond that, however, there is little accord.

The judicial theory of the Role Model Rule, articulated most prominently in Chambers v. Omaha Girls Club, Inc.,148 is premised on the BFOQ.149 The Rule states that an employer may take an adverse employment action against an employee if the employee is not a positive role model in line with the employer’s business purpose.150 Unlike the statutory Role Model Rule discussed next, the Chambers construction of the Role Model Rule is based on sex.151 Furthermore, as it is based on the BFOQ, it is subject to the same limitations, and thus it must be construed narrowly and cannot be based on community preference.152

In Chambers, the Omaha Girls Club terminated Chambers, an arts and crafts instructor, when she became pregnant out of wedlock. The Girls Club asserted that Chambers was no longer a positive role model for the Club as its purpose was to provide girls between the ages of eight and eighteen years “with exposure to the greatest number of available positive options in life.” Thus, the Girls Club felt that “to permit single pregnant staff members to work with the girls would convey the impression that the Girls Club condoned pregnancy for the girls.” The Eighth Circuit applied a version of the BFOQ Test: 1) Is there a basis in fact to believe that the job qualification is reasonably necessary for the job; 2) Does the job qualification have a manifest relationship to the fundamental purpose of the organization; 3) Are there any reasonable alternatives to discrimination? The court concluded that the Girls Club’s positive role model requirement was in fact a BFOQ, and Chambers’ termination was upheld.

However, one problem with the Chambers Test is that while requiring a finding of fact that the job qualification is reasonably necessary in the first prong, the court did not delineate what factual evidence would satisfy the requirement. Instead of relying on empirical studies, the court relied on the Girls Club’s honest belief that Chambers was a poor role model for the young girls. A “basis in fact” then, can be construed in this context to mean nothing more than an honest belief by the employer that the employee’s morals are contradictory to the primary purpose of the organization.\textsuperscript{162}

157 The Sixth Circuit in Everson v. Mich. Dept. of Corr., 391 F.3d 737, 748 (6th Cir.2004), laid out a three-prong test to determine when the BFOQ defense has been established. First, the employer must be able to prove a “basis in fact” to believe that the job qualification based on sex discrimination is reasonably necessary for the job. Second, the BFOQ must relate to the essence, the “central mission,” of the business. And third, the employer must prove that there are no reasonable alternatives to discriminate.

In \textit{Vigars v. Valley Christian Center of Dublin, California},\textsuperscript{163} the court applied the \textit{Chambers} Test. In that case, the plaintiff was a librarian at a Christian school who was terminated for her out-of-wedlock pregnancy.\textsuperscript{164} The school claimed the BFOQ defense, stating that Vigar’s pregnancy, and thus her moral character, violated the school’s concept of what a role model should be.\textsuperscript{165} Furthermore, they argued that the parents of the students expected a certain “moral character” of the teachers, and had the school not discharged Vigars, the parents would have become “‘upset.’”\textsuperscript{166} The court dismissed the parental preference argument, reiterating the long-held rule that customer preference and community attitudes never qualify as a BFOQ.\textsuperscript{167}

The \textit{Vigars} court then emphasized the narrow focus of the BFOQ exception\textsuperscript{168} and said that for the Role Model BFOQ to apply, “the person’s job must \textit{depend upon} the discriminatory characteristic.”\textsuperscript{169} In determining whether Vigars’ position as a school librarian depended upon being a role model, the court distinguished Vigars’ position to Chambers’ position as an instructor at the Girls Club. The court stated that while it is a counselor’s “\textit{function} … to act as role models for young girls,”\textsuperscript{170} the function of a librarian is unlikely that of a role model.\textsuperscript{171}

\textsuperscript{162} The Dissent in \textit{Chambers} pointed out this contradiction, criticizing the majority’s blind acceptance of the employer’s assertion, “[T]his court, accepts without any proof OGC’s assumption that the presence of an unwed pregnant instructor is related to teenage pregnancies. … instead [relying] on two or three highly questionable anecdotal incidents to support the rule.” \textit{Chambers, supra} note 148 (McMillian, J., dissenting).

However, as this was a ruling on a motion for summary judgment, the court declined to make any solid findings of fact.¹⁷²

In consideration of the above information, the judicial theory of the Role Model Rule requires an assessment of the following elements: 1) What is the primary purpose of the business; 2) Does the job position depend upon the discriminating characteristic; and 3) Do any reasonable alternatives to discrimination exist?

2. Statutory Construct – Immorality¹²³

The statutory construct of the Role Model Rule is based on state statutes regulating teacher certifications based, in part, on their moral character.¹⁷⁴ These statutes state that a teacher’s certificate may be revoked for “any charge affecting the moral character of any teacher within his district.”¹⁷⁵ In fact, some state statutes go as far as to require all applicants for a teaching credential to “submit reasonable evidence of … good moral character.”¹⁷⁶

However, a glaring problem with these statutes is that the term “immorality” is rarely defined or explained, creating an understanding that is unduly broad and vague.¹⁷⁷ Indeed, the courts have recognized this problem and created a solution, “[T]he terms ‘immoral’ or ¹⁷¹ "However, there is serious disagreement about how central her moral life was to her job as librarian, whether or not she was truly expected to act as a role model in the Chambers sense, and what impact her pregnancy truly had on her ability to perform either of those functions.” Vigars, 805 F.Supp. at 809.

¹⁷³ Immorality covers a wide range of conduct. This paper will only deal with immoral conduct so far as it applies to public notions of transgender people, and thus will not discuss or consider illegal conduct.

Transgender Teachers as Role Models for a Tolerant Society

‘unprofessional conduct’ are so broad and vague that, standing alone, they could be constitutionally infirm; hence the proper criteria is fitness to teach.”

In an attempt to define which factors should be considered in determining whether immoral conduct renders a teacher unfit to teach, the courts have articulated various factors to be considered. A compilation of common factors across state laws include: 1) “the likelihood that the teacher's conduct will have adversely affected students or other teachers;” 2) “the degree of the anticipated adversity;” 3) “the proximity or remoteness in time of the conduct;” 4) the intent behind the conduct; and 5) the “extent to which discipline may have a chilling effect upon either the rights of the teacher involved or other teachers.” This analysis is not an “and” test, but rather it is a factual determination based on the totality of the circumstances.

Courts have also discussed what weight should be given to community attitudes regarding the teacher as a role model. However, they have generally agreed that the decision is not an issue of fact to be determined by the school board, but rather one of law to be determined by the legislature or interpreted by the courts; it is too nebulous and broad a concept that is subject to arbitrary views, and has the potential to result in discrimination to leave in the ever-changing views of what the public considers moral.\textsuperscript{188} Therefore, community viewpoints are not to influence the determination of what or who makes a positive role model; rather, it is for the legislature to determine, or the courts to interpret.

3. Societal Viewpoints

Determining whether a transgender teacher can be an acceptable role model for school-age children has recently sparked extensive debate. This debate over whether a transgender person can be a good, moral, and effective teacher can be understood by surveying commentary in the blogosphere. In recent years the media has publicized several teachers whose transition became public knowledge,\textsuperscript{189} and blog posting and commenting has become an easy and oft-used way for people to respond with their viewpoints, and to debate them with others.\textsuperscript{190}

The prevailing view on several blogs is that transgender people are the antithesis of a good role model.\textsuperscript{191} While there are many arguments for this view, there appear to be three main arguments that encompass a host of other concerns: 1) Transgender people by definition are mentally and sexually unstable and thus incapable of competently teaching children; 2) transgender people are deceptive and thus not trustworthy; and 3) the only reason why transgender people come out is to “‘proselytize’ the child, expose the child to abnormality, pornography or overt sexuality…”\textsuperscript{192}

The contention that transgender people are unstable is based on prejudiced and stereotyped notions of what and who transgender people are. For example, one person said, “If someone is so screwed up in the head that they aren’t convinced they were born as the correct sex, I have a hard time seeing how they could be competent enough to teach children. It seems like more liberal idiocy, trying to force their [lack of] values on other people, especially our children and then making a big flatulent (sic) noise about ‘tolerance’ (all the while being as intolerant and hateful in their speech as possible!) when they get caught.” Other people argued that all transgender people are sexual deviants and thus will abuse the children. California’s recent passage of Proposition 8 banning gay marriage is a good example of the role uncertainty and fear can play in society. Prop 8 stated, “Changes the California Constitution to eliminate the right of same-sex couples to marry in California. Provides that only marriage between a man and a woman is valid or recognized in California.” California General Election, Official Title and Summary of Proposition 8, Prepared by the Attorney General, http://www.voterguide.sos.ca.gov/title-sum/prop8-title-sum.htm (last visited Dec. 4, 2008). The Proposition thus provided only for marriage, and said nothing about what would or would not be taught in schools. However, in their attempt to pass Prop 8, proponents played on parental and societal fears, and advertised that the failure to enact Prop 8 would work to inculcate homosexuality into the minds of young children. PinoyWired, Vote YES on Proposition 8 California! October 30, 2008, http://pinoywired.com/2008/10/30/vote-yes-on-proposition-8-california/. For example, one Yes on Proposition 8 “ad goes on to say that teaching marriage is required in 96 percent of all California schools, according to the State Public School superintendent's website.” Tomas Roman, Parents Outraged After Kids Shown in Prop 8 Ad, ABC7 News, Oct. 27, 2008, http://abclocal.go.com/kgo/story?section=news/local&id=6471449. They were able to focus the debate on their assertion that without the ban, public school children would be indoctrinated into accepting gay marriage against their parents' wishes, churches would be sanctioned for not performing same-sex weddings and the institution of marriage would be irreparably harmed.” Dan Morain and Jessica Garrison, Backers Focused Prop. 8 Battle Beyond Marriage, LOS ANGELES TIMES, Nov. 6, 2008, http://www.latimes.com/news/local/la-me-gaymarriage6-2008nov06,0,2331815.story.

Transgender Teachers as Role Models for a Tolerant Society

like these portray the misconceptions that people hold regarding transgender people—that they are abnormal and have serious mental issues, and they have no morals. People then rely on these arguments to say that a transgender teacher would not “be able to connect with and motivate the children as well as gain the confidence of the parents.”

The second common argument against transgender teachers is that they are pretending to be something that they are not, and are thus not trustworthy. This argument often rests on the argument that transgender people “misrepresent” themselves as the “wrong” gender. “Would you want a guy who thinks he is a duck teaching your kids? Anyone (sic) who tries to be a gender they are not is a nut job, its (sic) no different than someone trying to be a duck, cow (sic) or something else they are not.” However, this argument is flawed. As discussed above, this is a misconception of transgender people and should not be relied on.

The third prevalent argument against transgender teachers is that they have the intent to corrupt and “recruit” children. This can be traced to the doctrines of influential religious leaders in the community. A prominent voice in the argument that transgender people are negative role models is Dr. James Dobson. Dr. Dobson, named one of Time Magazine’s Twenty-five Most Influential Evangelicals in America, is the founder of Focus on the Family, and has been labeled by the New York Times as “the nation’s most influential evangelical leader.” As part of his evangelical work on his website, Dr. Dobson posts monthly letters addressing various social issues. In his letter of June 2006, entitled Education Turned Perversion, Dr. James Dobson Warns of A “Grand Strategy” To Entrap Our Children, Dr. Dobson stated, “All the ranting and raving about ‘tolerance’ is a ruse. The real purpose here is to promote [homosexuality, transexuality, and bisexuality] ‘lifestyles’ among the young. Hence, the fate of California's children, and by extension, the children of the nation, hangs in the balance.” With a highly influential leader of a large portion of America’s Christian population decrying the morality of transgender teachers, it is likely that the perception of a negative role model is, and will remain, a prevailing community opinion. However, it may not be the dominant view.

Interestingly, several bloggers also stated that they would not want their children exposed to a transgender teacher because it would create an uncomfortable situation for the parent. For example, one parent-blogger stated, “As a parent, one of my most favorite ways of spending time with my kids is laying in bed talking with them just before they go to sleep. My children are bright and rather inquisitive and I find that this is the time for their most heartfelt and poignant questions of the day. I would much rather spend that time answering questions pertaining to their faith, family, or friends, etc. then trying to explain why Ms. Whoever wants to become Mr.

Whoever or visa versa (sic).”209 This person, and others like her, unabashedly stated her anger at transgender teachers for creating a situation that made the parents uncomfortable. However, other bloggers merely voiced their uncertainty as to how to explain the change in a teacher.210

On the other end of the opinion-spectrum are those who believe that a teacher’s status as a positive role model is not contingent on whether he or she is a transgender person.211 “It’s the person that matters in the classroom. Not the gender of the teacher.”212 This view was echoed throughout the blogs and comments surveyed for this paper.213 Many people also went further to assert that transgender teachers are actually positive role models, reinforcing the “important lessons on life….acceptance, compassion, and respect. This teacher probably felt they didn't fit in their "body" their entire life and has finally been able to feel complete. How many kids go through their entire schooling feeling uncomfortable with some aspect of their life and are given hope by this teachers decision. Sometimes just knowing that you have a choice, and being different is accepted is ENOUGH!”214

Several people also made the point that parents should be the role models for their children—teaching acceptance and tolerance at home.215 One person stated, “I'd suspect that this would be less of a problem for the children than the parents as kids that age tend to accept things without the weight of preconceptions that you pick up with age.”216 Another stated, “[expecting] someone else to remain in a way that makes you feel most comfortable and avoid discussing the issue with your child directly is incredibly selfish and cruel.”217 Furthermore, a few people noted that children are more able than adults to simply accept what they are presented with and not be so confused and afraid.218

Finally, many people made the argument that transgender teachers would actually be positive role models. There are those who feel that transgender teachers would be positive role models in general, teaching children about tolerance and acceptance,219 and there are those who believe that there is a need for positive transgender role models for transgender youth.220 Several studies have shown that transgender youth are at a higher risk for drug use,221 homelessness,222 prostitution,223 and suicide.224

4. Application of the Role Model Theories to Transgender Teachers

a. Judicial Theory

As stated above, the judicial construct of the Role Model Theory proposes a three-prong test.\(^{225}\) The first prong requires an assessment of the primary purpose of a school. In the simplest of terms, it can be said that the purpose of a school is to provide academic and social education to children.\(^{226}\) The second prong asks whether a teaching position depends on being a positive role model for children. The discussion supra\(^ {227}\) of societal views of teachers clearly concluded that teachers are expected to be positive role models for children. However, what is left inconclusive is whether transgender people are positive or negative role models for school children. There appear to be strong arguments on either side of the coin. However, as the judicial Role Model Theory is an off-shoot of the BFOQ, it is subject to the same limitations, and therefore the Role Model Rule cannot be based on community attitudes.\(^ {228}\) Therefore, any adverse employment action taken under the umbrella of the Role Model Rule would have to be done by assessing individual character traits divorced from being transgender.

The third prong of the judicial Role Model Rule asks whether there are any reasonable alternatives to discrimination. Several bloggers and commentors suggested that a teacher who transitions should be transferred to another school.\(^ {229}\) While this may be a feasible approach, and some teachers may prefer this option, it is an approach that is grounded in community attitudes

\(^{225}\) See supra pt. III(A)(1).
\(^{226}\) It is the “preparation of individuals for participation as citizens.” Ambach, 441 U.S. at 76.

\(^{229}\) “This caring teacher should have transferred to another school if he/she was truly sincere about teaching children and not obsessed, tee hee, with her wonderous (sic) sex change.” Posting by Joyce Buckley to http://www.parentdish.com/2008/10/17/transgender-teacher-has-parents-upset/#comments (Oct. 18, 2008, 12:59 PM); “People not knowing, and protecting the children, isn't part of the plan. Otherwise, the teacher would have requested a transfer. Desensitizing kids and making transgenderism (sic) 'normal' to young children (I'M a tranny (sic), maybe YOU'RE one, TOO!!) is the plan.” Posting by informavoracious to FreeRepublic.com, supra note 190 (October 16, 2008, 2:01:57 PM).
and a fundamental belief that a transitioning transgender teacher would not be a positive role model. And, as stated, this violates of the BFOQ.

Therefore, it does not appear that school boards can ground an adverse employment action against a transgender person under the guise of the judicial Role Model Theory.

b. Statutory Construct

Due to the inherent vagueness of “immorality” in state statutes, courts have dictated their own standard for determining immorality\textsuperscript{230}—it must be conduct that renders the teacher unfit to teach.\textsuperscript{231} To assess whether a teacher is unfit to teach, the courts make a factual determination of several factors, and it must be done without influence of parental and community attitudes.\textsuperscript{232}

The first prong asks whether it is likely that the teacher’s conduct may adversely affect students.\textsuperscript{233} One argument that there may be an adverse affect is that a teacher’s transition may confuse children, resulting in unnecessary stress.\textsuperscript{234} However, this is not a very strong argument. In response, it can be argued that “being confused (1) is a part of life and (2) not a terrible thing! It’s all part of the learning experience.”\textsuperscript{235} In fact, it can be a great opportunity to teach children about acceptance, tolerance, and the overall complexity of human existence.\textsuperscript{236} Furthermore, it can be argued that children rebound from confusion much easier and much quicker than adults. Therefore, being a transgender teacher, without evidence of prior disciplinary problems, is not sufficient to render the teacher unfit to teach.

The second factor may pose more of a problem for transgender teachers. It looks to whether “community reaction will be so adverse to plaintiff to make her ineffective in the classroom and thus unfit to teach.” This consideration requires a very high degree of adversity, “The mere fact that some parents may have an adverse attitude towards plaintiff is not sufficient evidence in the Court's view to demonstrate that an attitude would prevail in the classroom that would undermine the learning environment.”

It is clear from news stories reporting that teachers pulled their children from the teacher’s class, as well as parent postings on blogs, that there is adversity when a teacher transitions. However, there are also several reports of students, parents, and other teachers standing up for their transgender teacher. The second factor requires a showing, however, of such a high degree of parental adversity that would prevent the teacher from being effective. In the reported news stories, no school district has determined that such an extreme point has been reached. Therefore, this factor is almost too tenuous to determine at present.

237 “Now that I’ve had time to think about this, I agree with some others on here that the kids can handle it better than the adults can. Making a huge deal out of it is the worst thing that can be done for the kids.” Posting by rwsmith29456 to Netter, supra note 189 (October 16, 2008); “For the first year or two of school, half the time kids accidentally call the teacher he/she anyway. The only way it could harm the children is if everyone starts making a big deal about it - oh that's what they're doing. Idiots.” Posting by haroldboot to Netter, supra note 189 (October 17, 2008).

242 “Leave your body the way it was created. This is just sick. I would have pulled my child as well. Should we go on teaching our child that it is perfectly ok to have a sex change because he/she feels a little out of place? Wouldn't it be better to teach our kids to cope with the problem rather than opt for surgery to fix it? BTW Baxter, they aren't chastized (sic) for being who they are, they are being chastized (sic) for being someone they are not.” Posting by STLCardsPhan to KSDK.com, supra note 189 (October 16, 2008, 9:58 AM CDT).

The third factor requires consideration of the proximity or remoteness in time of the teacher’s transition. Application of this factor shows the arbitrariness of firing on the basis of gender identity—it essentially says that if one teacher transitioned ten years ago and another teacher last year, the latter teacher may be terminated, while the former may not. This arbitrariness is impermissible discrimination.

The fourth factor looks at the intent behind the conduct. This factor speaks to the viewpoint held and promoted by Dr. Dobson,\(^{244}\) that “[t]he real purpose [of transgender teachers] here is to promote sexual ‘lifestyles’ among the young.”\(^{245}\) As explained above,\(^{246}\) Gender Identity is not a choice; it is an inherent “internal, personal sense of being a man or a woman (or a boy or girl).”\(^{247}\) Further, in a case of a school board dismissing a homosexual teacher,\(^{248}\) the court stated that not only does the teacher have a right to privacy, but he has a duty of privacy.\(^{249}\) This duty prohibits a teacher from speaking to children about his sex life, or other personal matters.\(^{250}\) However, outside this duty and absent factual evidence of attempts to actively promote transitioning in unwilling children, or other nefarious acts, merely being a transgender teacher is not sufficient to render the teacher unfit to teach.

The final factor asks whether an adverse action taken against a transgender teacher would have a chilling effect upon the rights of either the teacher involved, or any other teacher. For example, this would occur if the teacher in question were discharged in violation of the Due Process Clause of the 14th Amendment.\(^{251}\) However, this would not occur if the teacher involved claimed a violation of his or her right to privacy, because one cannot expect the same level of privacy in the workplace as in the home. Furthermore, any violation of Title VII, or state or local anti-discrimination laws, would clearly have a chilling effect upon the rights of both the teacher involved and other teachers. Therefore, it is likely that any adverse action taken against a teacher simply for being transgender will have a chilling effect upon that teacher’s rights.

IV. Conclusion

While courts appear to be interpreting Title VII’s “sex” broadly, and more Appellate Courts are interpreting “sex” to include gender identity, the Supreme Court has yet to rule on the issue. However, it is equally important to recognize the rate at which states, counties, and cities are enacting their own trans-inclusive anti-discrimination laws.

This article began by describing a case where two women were denied employment simply because they were single mothers. When that case was decided thirty-five years ago, society classified unwed mothers as possessing an “irredeemable moral disease,” and labeled them poor role models. The archaism of this reasoning is clear today, but in 1975 it was conventional thought. Thus when considering who or what a role model is, it is important to remember that “conduct socially acceptable today may be anathema tomorrow.”
